Forensic Neuroscience and Violence

Delivers a contemporary, detailed, and thorough exploration of the burgeoning field of neuroscience, violence, and the law. The book brings together the most recent empirical research on the neuroscience of various violent and sexually violent criminal offender populations and a variety of neurodevelopmental, psychiatric, and neurological disorders that may place an individual at risk for violence. Forensic application of neuropsychological assessment and neuroimaging methods to legal proceedings (neurolaw) will be explored through case examples and caselaw. The book constitutes the most comprehensive and internationally relevant resource for a wide range of forensic practitioners, graduate students, legal scholars, and academics in the field of forensic neuroscience and neurocriminology.

The book specifically emphasizes the most current neuropsychological and neuroimaging research on violent and sexually violent offender populations as well as neuropsychiatric and neurological conditions that lead to violence, and ultimately, to the courtroom. The book presents forensic neuroscience, neurocriminology, and neurolaw in a fundamental, coherent, and practical manner.

The distinguished author, John Matthew Fabian, a national expert in a forensic psychology and neuropsychology, presents a detailed and profound analysis of the neuroscience of both psychiatric and neurological disorders focusing on both brain structure and function and their relationship to violence. The author presents a comprehensive, precise, and meticulous overview of the neuroanatomy of violence in both juvenile and adult offenders as well as with particular psychiatric and neurological disorders that he has encountered in his forensic practice as an expert witness in forensic neuropsychology and the law.

The book addresses neuropsychological and neuroscientific empirically based risk factors for violence and aggression while applying these findings to forensic mental health assessment and criminal legal proceedings.

Readers will also benefit from the inclusion of the application of brain dysfunction often found in certain offender populations and neuropsychiatric disorders, with an emphasis on how these impairments apply to violence and specific forensic legal questions asked of experts in the courtroom.

Forensic Neuroscience and Violence will also earn a worthy place in the libraries of researchers and academics in specialty topics such as violence and sexual violence risk assessment, criminal behavior and neurocriminology, and developmental psychopathology, professionals in social work, addiction and dual-diagnosis, and certainly criminal lawyers. This compendium offers a perfect resource for professionals in forensic neuropsychology, forensic psychology, forensic psychiatry and neurocriminology and the law.

FPAMED Forensic Psychiatry Associates

Forensic psychologist and neuropsychologist consultant for fpamed in civil, criminal, and domestic cases. Each case includes a collaborative evaluation by both forensic psychologist/neuropsychologist and psychiatrist. Our forensic neuropsychologists are highly trained, skilled and broadly experienced in the administration and interpretation of the most widely accepted child, adolescent and adult neurocognitive and personality assessment instruments. They are experienced with assessing forensic as well as clinical populations. Virtually every forensic examination performed by an fpamed expert (with the obvious exception of testamentary capacity consultations in will contests) includes a full psychological testing assessment employing a battery of carefully chosen personality and/or neurocognitive instruments, followed by a detailed analysis of all psychological test data generated by experts from both sides.

Workplace dynamic threat management consultation as we practice it consists of two fundamental components:

A data-driven process of assessing risk of violence to a particular targeted individual or group, initially and ongoing; and

Intervening with recognized and prudent strategies for the purposes of interrupting escalation, reducing risk, redirecting stakeholders focus for non-risk situations, and managing workplace and campus disruption and anxiety.

WTS staff consultants are licensed mental health professionals with established records of specialization in risk assessment and risk management strategies. All have developed strong independent practices in addition to their WTS affiliation and service. Most of our members have academic affiliations at major universities and several are regular contributors to empirical research and peer-reviewed professional literature. We have accomplished thousands of consultations to employers of all sizes in diverse industries, governmental agencies, and in campus contexts. We work collaboratively with legal, human resource, and security managers in their efforts to maintain safe workplace and academic communities.
